In Justice is not Justice?

PROBABLE CAUSE - GENERALLY

A police officer may not arrest a person without an arrest warrant unless he has probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and that the person in question has committed that crime. Probable cause exists if the facts and circumstances known to the officer, and of which he had reasonably trustworthy information, are sufficient to warrant a prudent person in believing that the suspect probably has committed a crime. A mere possibility that the person has committed a crime is not enough, and there must be enough actual evidence to reasonably lead to the conclusion that the suspect has committed a crime.

The rule of probable cause is a non-technical conception of a reasonable ground for belief of guilt, requiring less evidence for such belief than would justify conviction but more evidence than that which would arouse a mere suspicion.

In dealing with probable cause, however, as the very name implies, we deal with probabilities. These are not technical; they are the factual and practical considerations of everyday life on which reasonable and prudent men, not legal technicians, act. Because many situations which confront officers in the course of executing their duties are more or less ambiguous, room must be allowed for some mistakes on their part. But the mistakes must be those of reasonable men, acting on facts leading sensibly to their conclusions of probability. The rule of probable cause is a practical, nontechnical conception affording the best compromise that has been found for accommodating . . . often opposing interests. Requiring more would unduly hamper law enforcement. To
